OVERDOSE PREVENTION AND RESPONSE

Reflecting on One Year of BC's Decriminalization

Minister Jennifer Whiteside marks BC's one-year

decriminalization milestone, highlighting a shift towards viewing substance use as a health matter rather than treating it as a criminal issue. The minister emphasized the complex nature of this public-health crisis, confirming a commitment to implement a diverse set of strategies. This involves investing in early intervention and prevention, broadening access to harm-reduction, enhancing medication-assisted treatments, and expanding treatment and recovery services to ensure better availability of care. For more details, read the full article here.

In line with the wider provincial policy change, Northern Health proactively appointed key positions, executed a comprehensive communication plan, adapted existing policies, and is actively involving people with lived and living experience of substance use. This reflects a notable transformation in healthcare approach.

First Nations Health Authority (FNHA) Toxic Drug Emergency Community Support Guide

Access the guide here for more details on FNHA's response and areas of support within the toxic drug emergency. In addressing the crisis, First Nations people in BC face disproportionate toxic drug poisoning events and deaths due to the ongoing legacy of colonialism. Despite these challenges, communities demonstrate resilience in their healing approaches. FNHA works hand-in-hand with BC First Nation individuals, families, and communities, providing culturally safe and trauma-informed support.

To address this crisis, FNHA has developed provincial and regional strategies for timely and effective harm reduction programming. Communities are urged to identify gaps through regional communication pathways, and FNHA commits to address these gaps within its capacity. Additionally, FNHA actively advocates for more resources, collaborating with government and non-government partners. This guide outlines the FNHA's areas of support within the toxic drug emergency response, adapting as the situation unfolds.
